Thai Law as a Civil Law System

by Dr. Munin Pongsapan

ABSTRACT

As a result of a number of unbalanced commercial treaties with foreign countries during the second half of the nineteenth century, the jurisdictional sovereignty of Thailand had been eroded by consular jurisdiction and the principle of extraterritoriality. These ‘unfair treaties’ forced the Thai government to establish a modern legal system as part of its attempts to recover full judicial autonomy. The government decided to follow the civilian legal tradition having established a number of codes of law, including the Penal Code and the Civil and Commercial Code, in the early twentieth century. Foreign legal rules and institutions were overwhelmingly imported; the code system of Thailand was established mainly through legal borrowing. Most of the borrowed rules have survived and seem to have taken root in the new environment. To some comparatists, this may be counted as another successful case of legal transplantation. But Dr. Pongsapan argues that legal borrowing in Thailand, especially reception of foreign private law, illustrates complexity and dirimental effects of legal transplantation. He explores the history of Thai modern law with a focus on modern Thai private law and assesses effects of legal transplantation in Thailand.
